Balkan Guerrillas and American Aid

attaches a draft of a proposed message from FDR to Churchill on the subject--suggests sending Donovan into the area as a "Lawrence of Arabia".

that the Balkan guerrillas are fighting each other. In addition, the situation is further complicated by rivalries and competition between O.S.S., the British S.O.E. and similar Russian agencies. "You know that the Russians are extremely touchy on any question affecting the Balkans and feel that they should have the say. It will be difficult enough to get our efforts and those of the British united. It probably will be impossible if we attempt to bring the Russians into the picture.

Another factor is the possibility of a major United States involvement in the Balkans, if we take the lead in guerrilla activities there. If General Donovan's activities were successful, it would have an enormous popular appeal and we might be subjected to pressure from our own people to move forces into the Balkans. This is exactly what the Prime Minister has wanted right along."
